WAS HORACE A GREEK?

Mr. G. G. Newman, Kingswood, No professor has dute more to popularise miveralty, under than Professor Darniey Naylor, Without fee or reward he has given his leaure time up to lecturing ocliterary and other kindred societies on iterary subjects. His cultured diction, his , flowing delivery, and a somewhat delicately siy humor-so dear to the erage Australian-have made him a the Workers' Educational Associa lecture he is reported to have said: D-Gow said Horace might have been a Greek. Speaking personally, he was corment calls for comment. Has the profes-sor made a discovery? Or is it that be-cause he wishes that Horace had been a Greek he is so positive in his statement?

To me all the evidence seems to point that he was not a Greek. Let us first cousulf. Horace himself. In that remarkable tribute which he paid to his father's care bute which he paid to his father's care and attention to his cluedtion, the sixth Satire in the First Book, he says, "Nune ad me redee Bertino paire natum, Quem rodunt omnes Bertino paire natum," and by the resiltion of the three words "born of a father, 3 freedman," and the hiterness of the words "whom all represels," he clearly words "whom all represels," he clearly words "whom all represent," he clearly conveys the taunts and gibes he had re-elved about the lewness of his birth. Had he been Greek either on his father's aids or his mother's, surely this would have been his opportunity to say so. He was speaking freely to his patron, and to his unflinching independence of character and that poriod the Robans were completely under the spell of the Greeks, and it would have been an additional rethough my father was a slave yet he was a Greek." As neither on this or any though my father was a save yet he was Greek." As neither on this or any other occasion, as far as any reading goes, did he mention that fact, he could not have been a Greek. One or other than the case, which is not have been in Greek. One or other than he case, which is not had been then the case. What, in effect, he did say was—"Your princep" lineage, Mascenan, does not lead you to do what many do, despise such humbly been people as mo the freedoman's seal. You think that it is man is fitned free and you readed the country of the country and your reasoning is sound, carped at me as 'a freeman's son.' I was introduced to you I was too much abashed to say much, but at least I mad no pretensions. I said what was true about my birth and state. You answered little, but nine months after you sent for

PRESS AND UNIVERSITY

The munificent gift of £20,000 by Sir Langdon Bonython to the University of Adelaide is worthy of more than fleeting notice. This further generous act will make the relationship of his name with that institution as memorable as has been his long and laudable association with the work of the School of Mines. The present donation is for an endowment the interest of which shall cover the cost of a Chair in Law, it will thus be seen that the cause of higher education in this State is under a debt of obligation to a distinguished leader of the Press.

It is, of course, the business of men of every calling to foster the highest traditions of education, and Adelaide has been fortunate, indeed, in that respect. The foundation of the University was laid in the first place by the offer of a liberal donation to the work of Union College, a theological faculty which the friends of the college in the church persuaded the donor to divers to the more important civic call for University facilities.

Men of means in the commercial and pastoral industries have been generous in the provision of various foundations at the University, which, while not wealthy in the sense that some American Universities are, is yet able to maintain a high degree of education on the level of the best British University standards.

The Council of the University has been alive to its responsibility to
