Dear Darling,

Quite a long while ago now I sent you through Topley a report on the fine series of tuberculin tests which you organised. The one I mean had, I think, twelve animals at each of a number of different centres.

The American journal, Biometrics Bulletin, which is a good deal concerned with pharmacological and taxological assays, have asked if

I could give them something about this problem from a methodological standpoint. This I should like to do if you, and I suppose Bryer also, should be inclined to permit me to use the data, and it would, of course, help me greatly if you could dig out my report, of which I seem not now to have a copy.

Yours sincerely,
