Dear Mr. Fisher:

Having spend some time in perusal of your book:

"Statistical Method for Research Workers", I hope
I may be excused for addressing you these few lines.

Last week I introduced your book to a small group of young statisticians-- sociologists and psychologists--to which I belong. It produced quite a stir and led toward an animated exchange of opinions.

In these debates I was at first propounding the point of view on Statistics as applied Mathematics.

But later I was carried on by the logical development of your ideas and now some of my friends go so far as to accuse me of deluding Statistics with "transcendental heresies".

Believeing that I am still in line with your way of reasoning,--not being very sure about it, though--

I address to your indulgence. Would it be an imposition upon you to ask whether you could find a few free minutes to glance over several pages which I would like to send to you and then jot down the points which you consider to be not in accord with your interpretation of the nature of Statistics?

Please be frank by all means and do not let me
inconvenience you in any way.

May I hear from you soon.

Believe me,

Yours sincerely,
