Dear Dr. Malisoff:

I am exceedingly sorry to hear of the tragic circumstances in which you are placed. I can only offer my sincere sympathy and the hope that the great work to which you have set yourself will prove, as I believe only good work can, a lasting mitigation of your grief.

I was encouraged by your letter to think that revision of my paper, which I enclose in a revised form, would make it satisfactory for its purpose. I have been very greatly aided by your very valuable and thoughtful notes, and though you suggest that you are the first reader of many, I am sure there are not many to whom it is better worth while to make my thought clear.

You will see for yourself how much I have gained from your notes. With respect to your comment on p. 10, however, I feel that an adequate analysis of what different writers have meant by vitalism is beyond me, and something of the kind would be needed if your penetrating comment were to be followed up.

Yours sincerely,
